Also, for any Jews who are interested in assembling information on Shanghai's Jews, I add the following information:

I have lived here only from 1981 onward, but have written and edited a number of articles on the pre-war era (most especially on the Jewish refugees) and I have access to some interesting people and documents. If you have a need for contacts, the following groups are composed of people who lived in Shanghai in the pre-war period: The China-Judaic Institute (232 Lexington Drive, Menlo Park, CA 94025, Tel: (415-323-1769); The China Connection (4831 Drummond Ave, Chevy Chase, MD 20815); and Mr. Kurt Maimann, 59, Hovevei Tzion Street, 63346 Tel Aviv, Israel. (This latter gentleman heads up a Shanghai "alumni" group in Israel.) I know many other old Shanghailanders, but these addresses would yield up the largest number with the least effort.

I have neither the time nor the facilities to research or photocopy extensively, but if you have specific questions I would be glad to look up things for you in my spare time. A self-addressed envelope and several loose stamps with each request would be appreciated. Write to:

CHINESE PORTS AND SHIPPING FACILITIES.

By Trade Commissioner Paul Page Whitham.

INTRODUCTION.

China's commercial contact with the outer world being chiefly by the sea, it is fortunate that the country possesses an extensive coast line with numerous harbors. While there are many small ports served by coasting steamers and native junks, the first-class ports frequented by the large trans-Pacific and European liners are few in number. Each premier port is supported by an important hinterland, and embraces within its trade influence a number of outports. Using these chief trade centers as the bases of description, it will be advantageous to indicate three divisions of China, two of the sections including a premier port. The three divisions may be designated as Central China ports, North China ports, and South China ports.

Shanghai is not only the chief port of Central China, but also the premier port of all China. Its foreign trade as indicated by the Maritime Customs reports for the year 1918 represents nearly half of the entire foreign commerce of China. Its trade importance is the result of the position of the port relative to the Yangtze basin, the rich central section of China, and to the river, which, with its tributaries, forms a great inland water highway system.

In the northern division it is not altogether clear as to which of several ports may be said to hold the chief position. Furthermore, the district is more or less tributary to Shanghai by means of the coasting steamship services. Therefore a description of the northern division would naturally follow that of the Central China ports.

The southern division contains the premier port of Hongkong, which though not Chinese (being a British colony), nevertheless serves as the gateway through which passes most of South China's foreign trade.

COMPILER'S NOTE: During the so-called Cultural Revolution of 1966-76, all cemeteries in Shanghai containing western graves were looted, destroyed and then plowed over and buildings built on the sites. Probably a pile of tombstones was located at some later time and the Chinese government decided to note the names off of them (hence the misspellings). They then had stone slabs of uniform size (about 20"x30") inscribed with these names. They have been placed in long rows in the Song Qing Ling memorial cemetery on old Hong Qiao Road. They are in a separate section off to the right, amidst trees and shrubs. There is no indication, however, that the bodies were ever moved to this site. This would have been extremely unlikely in view of the anti-foreign sentiment (and the chaos) of that time.
